What students and grads need to know about themselves to create compatible professional and personal relationships

Available in keynote & seminar formats

ACCORDING TO THE LATEST RESEARCH, of all the challenges facing students and grads today, stress and relationship issues that impact mental health and safety top the list. Whether initiating a new love interest, interacting with friends and family, interfacing with a professor, or addressing a prospective employer, students are confronted with life-changing relationship decisions on a daily basis. The trouble is that most young people don't know how to prepare for a relationship or even recognize when it begins, and are unaware of the power of compatibility to guide their choices.

Knowing who you are is the first step to successful, sustainable relationships.

Relationship compatibility expert Elizabeth E. George knows that college-age young people think they can conquer the world, and she equips them with the tools to make it happen. With more than three decades experience in college settings, Elizabeth dynamically connects with and challenges students "where they live." She helps them take a look inside themselves to establish critical self-descriptors, recognize danger zones, and build a powerful personal presence.

Your audience will learn to:

- Identify and establish critical self-descriptors
- Recognize danger zones
- Make the most of learning and mentoring opportunities
- Build a powerful personal presence
